Not illustrated. 1829 Excerpt: .remove the whelps from the kennel, and lay them severally and apart one from the other; then they watch which of them the bitch first takes and carries into her kennel again, and that they suppose to be the best. Others again imagine that which weighs least when it sucks to be the best: this is certain, that the lighter whelp will prove the swifter. As soon as the bitch is littered, it is proper to choose them you mean to preserve, and drown the rest: keep the black, brown, or of one color, for the spotted are not much to be esteemed, though of hounds the spotted are to be valued. Hounds for chase are to be chosen by their colors. The white, with black ears, and H spot at the setting on of the tail, are the principal to compose a kennel of, if of good scent and condition. The black hound, or the black tanned, or the all liver-colored, or all white: the true talbots are the best of the stronger line; the grizzled, whether mixed or unmixed, so they be shag-haired, are the best verminers, and a couple of these are proper for a kennel. In short, take these marks of a good hound: that his head be a middle proportion, rather long than round: his nostrils wide, his ears large, his back bowed; his fillet great, his haunches large, thighs well trussed, ham straight, tail big near the reins, the rest...
